The compound is available under the brand names Alachlor and Tordon 740. Alachlor has been in use since the 1970s, and is highly effective against annual weeds. It is effective against most broad-leaf and grass weeds that do not have legume or grass phytoremediation characteristics, and is therefore used to control weeds in pastures. The mechanism of action of alachlor is currently unknown. However, it is suggested that the compound acts by binding to the mitochondrial electron transport system. The toxic effects of alachlor are low. It is available in either a granular or liquid form. At high concentrations it is a contact herbicide, affecting its targets only once the herbicide comes into contact with the plant surface. With most herbicides, alachlor is very effective and extremely selective, only taking effect when a weed is metabolically active. Therefore, most weeds become insensitive to the compound after it is applied. When alachlor is active against a weed, the target tissue is killed (necrosis), and the plant is prevented from growing and reproducing more weed seeds. Alachlor undergoes considerable metabolism in the soil. In animals and fungi, it is transformed into atrazine and desethyl-alachlor. Alach

I know I could do something like this: if(typeof(Number(10)) == "Number"){ // it's a number, do something with it } I'm wondering if there is a simpler way to do this, possibly using JQuery's "isX" function. I tried using isNumber: if(isNumber(Number(10))){ // it's a number, do something with it } ...but that didn't work. I have also tried isNumeric, isNaN, and other tests, but nothing worked. A: Combine it with regex to check whether the string is a number: if(/^[0-9]$/).test(Number(10)){ // it's a number, do something with it } The strrist starts with a digit ^, followed by any number of digits [0-9] and ends by the end with a digits Q: Why doesn't my regex consume my string when using lookahead?
